MI - Traps to Avoid

Question/Answer Trap
The counselor and client fall into a pattern of question/answer, question/answer, and so on. The problem with this pattern is that it tends to elicit passivity and closes off access to deeper levels of experience. Thus, clients are not encouraged to explore issues in depth, and the client-counselor relationship becomes increasingly hierarchical even to the point of taking on the air of an interrogation.

Confrontation/Denial Trap
Most counselors have had the experience of interviewing a client who is not yet ready to change, and who provides a reasonable argument in response to every statement the counselor makes. The counselor and client then engage in an argumentative, confrontation/denial trap, in which the client counters each argument for change with an argument for remaining the same. An example of a mild confrontation/denial trap is illustrated in the following conversation:

One of the benefits to the counselor of adapting a motivational approach is the avoidance of such discouraging interchanges. Rather than engaging in futile attempts to convince the client to change, the MI approach encourages the client to voice the reasons for change. Remember that if a person feels backed into a corner, or one point of view, the person will usually defend that point of view more strongly. If you leave your client with no other option than to argue with you, that is what you will get. MI-style approaches may help the client and the counselor avoid the inevitable frustration of two people working at odds.

Expert Trap
In the "expert trap," counselors fall into providing direction to the client without first helping the client to determine his or her own goals, direction and plans. The problem with this approach is that clients may tend to passively accept the counselor's suggestions, and may only halfheartedly commit to the difficult work involved in changing. A counselor using the MI approach is guiding, that is, he or she will offer suggestions for change. However, this is done after the client's motivation is high, after initial exploration of multiple pathways to change, and only upon client's request, or when the counselor perceives that the client is in immediate danger if not given advice.
Labeling Trap
The labeling trap happens when a counselor attempts to convince a client that he or she is an "alcoholic," "addict," or some other label. As Miller and Rollnick state, "because such labels often carry a certain stigma in the public mind, it is not surprising that people with reasonable self-esteem resist them" (1992, p. 68). They also point out that "the Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) philosophy specifically recommends against such labeling of others" (p. 68). Despite this, some counselors believe that clients must accept a label or diagnosis in order to change their behavior. MI theory disagrees with this view, and suggests that counselors de-emphasize labels whenever possible.

Premature Focus Trap
Although MI does not suggest that counselors simply "follow" the clients' lead as is done in Rogerian or Person-Centered therapy, MI also cautions counselors against focusing too quickly on a specific problem or aspect of a problem. Difficulties with premature focus include raising client resistance and focusing on an unimportant or secondary problem.

Blaming Trap
Clients may wish to blame others for their problems. Counselors may feel compelled to show the client how he or she is at fault for the difficulties encountered. In the MI approach, neither of these urges are seen as useful. Blame is irrelevant. Miller and Rollnick suggest establishing a "no-fault" policy when counseling a person, and commenting, "I'm not interested in looking for who's responsible, but rather what's troubling you, and what you might be able to do about it" (1991, p. 70).
